GW LAW PROFESSOR TO PRESIDE OVER AAAS SYMPOSIUM ON SCIENTIFIC FREEDOM AND NATIONAL SECURITY

WASHINGTON, D.C. -- George Washington University National Law Center Associate Professor Mary M. Cheh has been chosen by the American Association for the Advancement of Science to preside over a symposium on "Striking a Balance: Scientific Freedom and National Security" at its annual meeting in Washington, D.C., January 7, 1982. Professor Cheh will discuss government control of private ideas during the symposium. Others participating include:

- Congressman Paul N. McClosky (R-Calif.) discussing "born secret" information and attempts to amend the Atomic Energy Act;
- Adm. Bobby R. Inman, deputy director, Central Intelligence Agency, discussing national security and technical information administration;
- Peter J. Denning, president of the Association for Computing Machinery, discussing staunching of scientific information flow;

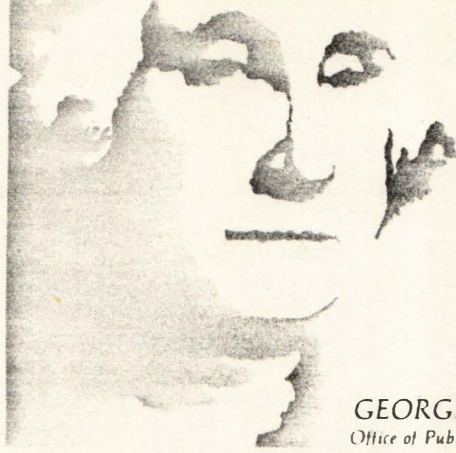

--more--

- Attorney Harold P. Green, professor emeritus, GW National Law Center, on information controls under the Atomic Energy Act; and
- Attorney Daniel C. Schwartz, former general counsel, National Security Agency, on a case study in cryptography.

According to Cheh, "The United States government has taken new steps to impose secrecy restrictions on private ideas—ideas developed independent of government supervision or support."

"These new initiatives," she adds, "combined with the government's claimed authority to restrain publication of atomic energy information developed from open sources, and to impose secrecy orders on and, in effect, confiscate all private inventions 'detrimental to the national security,' raise anew perplexing questions about the legality and the wisdom of such actions."

For information on this symposium, call Professor Cheh at (202) 676-6748.

RE: "VARIETIES OF FEMALE HUMOR" Free Lecture at GW

"Varieties of Female Humor" will be explored in a free lecture to be held at George Washington University on Wednesday, January 6, 1982, at 8 p.m., in GW's Marvin Center, third floor ballroom, 21st and H Streets, NW. The public is invited.

Phyllis Palmer, GW assistant professor of women's studies and of American civilization, will discuss the work of female writers from Jane Austen to Virginia Woolf and from George Eliot to Ellen Goodman. Dr. Palmer will show that these women, while they drew their humor from the foibles of their own eras, share a common artistic sensibility: love for the accurate rendering of the content of daily life and hostility to sickly sentiment.

Palmer's presentation is part of the First Wednesday Lecture Series, held monthly and sponsored by GW's Alumni Relations Office. For information and reservations, call 676-6435 at least a day in advance.
